

The role of the Algerian community in France in supporting the liberation revolution 1954-1962

Achouri Ahmed

University of Algiers 2 (Algeria)

yacineachouri09@gmail.com

Abstract ;

The French occupation of Algeria in 1830 led to the deprivation of Algerians of their rights and lands, forcing them to migrate to France in search of work under harsh conditions and for meager wages, in addition to being subjected to military service. The interaction of Algerian migrants with European societies and the spread of the principles of freedom and self-determination contributed to the development of their national and political consciousness. They organized themselves into associations and parties that demanded rights and then independence, and this played a prominent role in supporting the Algerian War of Independence, which broke out on November 1, 1954.

Article info

Received

Decembre 14.2025

Accepted

January 14.2026

Keyword:

- ✓ Keyword:
- ✓ Keyword:
- ✓ Keyword:

1. Introduction

After the French colonizers set foot in Algeria, they resorted to numerous policies to annex the country as a French province. This involved enacting a series of laws to confiscate Algerian lands for the benefit of European settlers. These included the Senatus Consult Law of 1863, the Warnier Law of 1873, and the Indigenous Code, all of which aimed to strip Algerians of their rights and deprive them of even the most basic means of a decent life. Faced with this situation, many Algerians emigrated in various directions, particularly to France, seeking better conditions for stability and a dignified life, or to pursue education.

Migration from Algeria to France occurred in several periods, most notably the pre-World War I era. This period was restricted by a decree issued on May 16, 1874, requiring a travel permit for emigration to France. This decree was repealed on June 18, 1913, following recommendations from a committee established to investigate Algerian migration to France. The committee advocated for encouraging migration due to its benefits to the French economy. The First World War period then opened the floodgates to migration, organized by the French Ministry of War. This involved registering workers in Algeria, transporting them to France, and then distributing them there. In addition, there was the conscription of Algerians into the French army. Following the outbreak of the First World War, through which they discovered a new life different from their miserable life in their country, on November 29, 1939 a decree was issued to apply the special law on immigration to the people of North Africa issued on July 24, 1924, whereby a number of Algerian workers were summoned by the French Ministry of Labor to fill the labor shortage, so the migration of Algerians to France continued and increased the number of immigrants in the period between the two wars 1918-1939 to reach 164,900 in 1954.

The Algerian diaspora played a prominent role in the national liberation movement, beginning with the establishment of the North African Party in 1926, followed by the founding of the People's Party in 1937, the Algerian National Movement in 1946, and the Special Organization in 1947, which was preparing for armed struggle until its discovery in 1950. This discovery triggered a crisis within the Movement for the Triumph of Democratic Liberties, leading to its fragmentation and the subsequent formation of the National Liberation Front (FLN) and the declaration of the War of Independence on November 1, 1954. The architects of the revolution recognized the crucial contribution of the Algerian diaspora to the liberation struggle, particularly in France. The decision was made to activate and support the Algerian community in France itself, in solidarity with their fellow freedom fighters in Algeria who were fighting for the very freedom they had sought to deny.

From this perspective, it was imperative for the National Liberation Front (FLN) to establish a political organization in France to assume responsibility for revolutionary activity, and to organize and structure the Algerian community to support the revolution and force the colonial power to concede to the Algerian people's demands for freedom and independence. To examine this issue in more detail, we have chosen to pose the following questions:

- What were the circumstances surrounding the establishment of the National Liberation Front (FLN) Federation in France, which embraced the Algerian community and contributed to the armed struggle to liberate the homeland from the colonial power (France)?
- How was the FLN Federation able to organize the Algerian community in France within the framework of the armed struggle declared on November 1, 1954?
- What were the manifestations of the Algerian community's activities in France in supporting and assisting the Algerian liberation revolution?

To answer these questions, we have developed a plan containing four essential elements within the body of this document. The first element was devoted to discussing the circumstances of the establishment of the National Liberation Front Federation in France. The second element mentioned the development of the structure of the National Liberation Front Federation in France in its four stages, with the leadership team of each stage and its support networks, which were made up of French and Europeans sympathetic to the liberation revolution. As for the third element, we devoted it to the activity of the National Liberation Front Federation in France, in terms of organizing the Algerian community and strengthening its structures, which implement the decisions of the National Liberation Front. Finally, as a fourth element, we touched on the guerrilla operations and peaceful demonstrations of the Federation within French territory, such as the operations of August 24, 1958, the demonstrations of October 17, 1961, and the strike of November 1, 1961.

2. Establishment of the National Liberation Front (FLN) Federation in France and structuring of the Algerian community there.

The Algerian community was at the forefront of playing a crucial role in building the national movement, from the North African Star to the Movement for the Triumph of Democratic Liberties (MTLD). When preparations were underway to launch the armed struggle, the role the Algerian diaspora could play in supporting the liberation revolution, particularly financially, was taken into consideration. They were also expected to join the revolution alongside their brothers and sisters in Algeria, which began on November 1, 1954. The Algerian community abroad welcomed the news of the revolution's outbreak with open arms.(1)

The FLN undertook the task of raising awareness and convincing Algerian immigrants in France that the FLN had ignited the revolution on November 1st and represented a strategic choice to realize the Algerian people's aspirations for independence and freedom. Therefore, the same struggle should be organized among the Algerian community and workers in France. As a result, it was decided to strengthen the ranks of the revolution with an external body under the title of the Seventh Wilaya in the revolutionary organization and in the political and military struggle under the name of the "Federation of the National Liberation Front".(2) It was based in the areas where Algerian workers were present in large numbers, and a work program was determined that included recognizing the authority of the National Liberation Front and introducing its goals and liberation method according to the statement of November 1, 1954 among immigrants as an urgent goal, and establishing committees specializing in propaganda, finance and trade union affairs and establishing intervention teams to thwart the French police plan and prepare for any military action in France, as well as working to win over French public opinion by spreading the news of the outbreak of the war of liberation for the independence of Algeria.

Algerian immigrants abroad welcomed the outbreak of the glorious revolution and supported it from its inception. Despite the strict surveillance imposed on them by the colonial authorities, the Algerian community did not hesitate to move forward with the federation and play a significant role in the struggle, just as the National Liberation Front (FLN) had organized itself within the country for independence. The liberation revolution surprised colonial France on its own soil through a well-organized military structure based on utmost secrecy, effective planning, and precise coordination from the highest levels of command to the grassroots fighters.(3)

3. Establishment of the FLN Federation in France and its Support Networks:

The leadership of the FLN entrusted the late Mujahid Mohamed Boudiaf with the task of establishing a FLN organization in France, as he was the head of the FLN's external delegation. In 1955, he met in Luxembourg with members of the Movement for the Triumph of Democratic Liberties (MTLD) present in the eastern regions of France, where Mourad Tarbouche was tasked with forming the initial nucleus of the FLN Federation in France. Leaflets containing the November 1st Declaration were distributed in Peugeot car factories and other workshops and mines where Algerian immigrants worked. The committee also played a significant role in organizing and raising awareness among Algerian immigrants about their role as a conscious working class.(4) Furthermore, the committee worked within various unions, engaging with the French working class to gain their support for the liberation movement.

The Federation succeeded in gaining the trust of the immigrant community and then the support of French sympathizers with the Algerian cause, including members of European support networks who provided invaluable services to the Federation's activists by sheltering and transporting them to various locations to avoid detection.(5)

From its founding until 1962, the Federation underwent several phases during which its leadership changed. It strived to achieve its goals, distributing leaflets and statements explaining the objectives of the liberation revolution to the French public in particular, and the international community in general, to highlight the justice of the Algerian cause, the legitimacy of the Algerian people's struggle to regain their national sovereignty and freedom, and to emphasize the necessity of extending this struggle to French soil. The Federation also worked to raise awareness among the Algerian community about its responsibilities abroad, which aimed to adopt the idea of national liberation and work for it, and not to fall into the trap of the French authorities' apparatus, which was based on supporting the conflict of the enemy brothers, i.e., between the fighters of the National Liberation Front and the sympathizers of the Algerian national movement (Messalianism).(6)The Federation established "Special Intervention Groups" to confront the threat and the dangerous escalation against the fighters of the National Liberation Front.

This work proceeded in carefully planned stages and steps within a military structure called the "Special Organization" of the National Liberation Front (FLN) Federation in France. Its organization was very rigorous. A militant would go through the stage of sympathizer, then active member, and finally become a militant in the FLN Federation in France. They would then be assigned by a regional or provincial official to form a unit, which they would lead in carrying out operations, according to their area of responsibility and presence. They were distributed across five regions adopted by the Federation: the first was the Paris region and its suburbs; the second was the North and East region; the third was the Central region (Lyon); the fourth was the Southeast region (Marseille); and the fifth was the Southwest region. Each region was divided into districts, then sections, then divisions, then branches and groups, and finally cells.(7)Care was taken to reduce the burden on the grassroots level to avoid clashes with the colonial authorities. A cell consisted of three militants headed by a cell leader, a group was made up of three sub-cells headed by a leader, and every three groups formed a branch.

In the spring of 1958, the Federation was reorganized according to the demands of the circumstances. It was decided to establish structures outside French borders, specifically in Switzerland, Belgium, and especially Germany. The National Liberation Front (FLN) had rented small apartments in several cities, including Berlin, North Rhine-Westphalia, and others, thanks to German assistance, after establishing a branch in Düsseldorf, which later became the Federation's headquarters.(8)

All these measures were taken to protect the militants, whose presence in France had become dangerous due to constant persecution and assassinations by colonial authorities and their collaborators. In this way, the FLN Federation closely monitored the Algerian community after dividing French territory into four departments in 1958, six in 1959, and seven in 1961, when Switzerland, Germany, and Belgium were annexed. It should be noted that Belgium comprised two regions, Germany three, and Switzerland one. The purpose of this increasing division was to save time and avoid long commutes for cadres; the more regions there were, the more Those involved had to resort to the decentralized system, not to mention the stranglehold imposed by the administration and the colonial police. Consequently, the leadership of the National Liberation Front Federation in France was obliged to change its organization from time to time, so as not to give the French authorities the opportunity to uncover its structures, especially the grassroots ones.(9)

With this flexibility, the regional official carried out his duties with a force exceeding 3,500 men, including 500 activists and officials, who undertook the tasks of organization, structuring, political education, and fundraising.(10) This included armed operations, both defensive and offensive, planned in advance by "armed groups," targeting spies, collaborators, torturers, and abusive police officers. The federation also had the responsibility of monitoring health and justice committees, conducting social investigations, supporting prisoners and guiding them in choosing their lawyers, disseminating FLN literature through various means, and providing financial assistance to their families. In addition, it held weekly meetings with its subordinates to review the situation and collect membership dues.(11)

The FLN Federation went through four phases from its founding in 1954 until the declaration of independence in 1962 as shown in the table:(12)

Table 1. The FLN Federation went through four phases from its founding in 1954 until the declaration of independence in 1962)

First federation 1955 -1956	Second Federation 1956 -1957	Third Federation 1957 -1958	Forth Federation 1958 - 1962
- Mourad Tarbouche Abderahmane Gharas - Ahmed Doum -Nouredine Bensalem -Abdelkrim suissi -Mohamed Mechat -Saleh Elouanchi -MouhamedMadi -Ahmed Taleb Ellbrahmi - mouradTarbouche AbderahmaneGharas - Ahmed Doum -NouredineBensalem -Abdelkrim suissi -Mohamed Mechat -Saleh Elouanchi -MouhamedMadi -Ahmed Taleb Ellbrahmi	-Mohamed Lebjaoui -Tayeb Boulehrouf -Ahmed Boumengel -Mohamed Lebjaoui -Tayeb Boulehrouf -Ahmed Boumengel	-Omar Boudaoud -Ahmed Boumengel -Kadour El adlani -Mohamed Harbi -Hocine Mendji -Messaoud gueroudj - Abdelkrim suissi -Omar Boudaoud -Ahmed Boumengel -Kadour El adlani -Mohamed Harbi -Hocine Mendji -Messaoud gueroudj - Abdelkrim suissi	-Omar Boudaoud - Ali Haroune -Kadour El Adlani -Said Bouaziz -Abdelkrim suissi -Omar Boudaoud - Ali Haroune -Kadour El Adlani -Said Bouaziz -Abdelkrim suissi

- mouradTarbouche	-Mohamed Lebjaoui	-Omar Boudaoud	-Omar Boudaoud
AbderahmaneGharas	-Tayeb Boulehrouf	-Ahmed Boumengel	- Ali Haroune
- Ahmed Doum	-Ahmed Boumengel	-Kadour El adlani	-Kadour El Adlani
-Nouredine Bensalem		-Mohamed Harbi	-Said Bouaziz
-Abdelkrim suissi		-Hocine Mendji	-Abdelkrim suissi
-Mohamed Mechati		-Messaoud gueroudj
-Saleh Elouanchi		- Abdelkrim suissi
-MouhamedMadi
-Ahmed Taleb Ellbrahmi

Source: Omar Boudaoud, Five Years at the Head of the Federation of France, From the Algerian People's Party to the National Liberation Front, Dar El Kasbah, Algeria 2007, p. 98

3. Activities of the National Liberation Front Federation in France:

The success of the National Liberation Front Federation in France in organizing the Algerian community led to a series of positive steps, primarily gaining its trust, especially among the working class. This was achieved through the establishment of the "General Association of Algerian Workers" in February 1957, which served as a representative to French trade unions to defend their material and social rights. As a branch of the General Union of Algerian Workers, it operated according networks of Algerian workers abroad and activists of the National Liberation Front Federation in France. It was transferred to Switzerland to be deposited in the accounts of the National Liberation Front for the purpose of financing the National

Front (FLN) federation was the large-scale demonstrations by immigrants at the end of the first week of October 1955 in several French provinces, such as Paris, Saint-Étienne, and Metz. These demonstrations took the form of

to the organizational structure established by the Federation, with local, sectoral, and then regional councils headed by an organizing committee. The Association also forged relationships with various political and religious circles and anti-colonial movements. It published the newspaper (The Algerian Worker) in Algeria, as the central mouthpiece of the Union, before moving to France. Its publication was halted by the colonial authorities in 1958.(13) The Association worked to defend the rights of Algerian workers in all aspects, in addition to supporting them through financial contributions via

Liberation Army inside the country, especially in the field of armament.(14)

One manifestation of the Algerian community's solidarity with the liberation revolution and the National Liberation gatherings for marches, joined by thousands of foreign supporters. Armed with clubs and sticks, they carried banners and chanted anti-colonial slogans calling for Algerian independence. Clashes erupted with the police, resulting in numerous injuries and deaths on both sides. The demonstrations continued throughout the day and into the late hours of the night. Similar demonstrations were repeated with large numbers of immigrants in early April 1956 in several French cities, including Saint-Georges, Reunion Ville, and Maubeuge. They carried the national flag and anti-French banners.(15)The police forcibly dispersed them, leaving many injured and making arrests after clashes between the demonstrators and the security forces. The arbitrary arrests of Algerian immigrants, carried out from time to time under the pretext of threatening the security and safety of French territory, are a clear indication of the Algerian community's attachment to their homeland and its strong support for the National Liberation Front (FLN). This was demonstrated by the response to the eight-day strike called for by the FLN on January 28, 1957. During this strike, some shops owned by Algerians in Algiers and other French cities closed, and many immigrants gathered in the streets to denounce the injustices of colonialism and demand Algerian independence. They were subsequently arrested en masse for allegedly attempting to disrupt security and public order.(16)

The Federation also succeeded in gaining the support of French and other foreign sympathizers of the revolution. Of particular note in this regard are the clandestine networks established by French citizens in 1958 to support the Algerian people's struggle within France itself. These networks were linked to the philosopher and professor Francis Jeanson, who exploited the cultural and intellectual milieu to disseminate his initiative, persuade his friends, and recruit followers. To spread these principles, the network resorted to publishing a clandestine newsletter entitled (For Truth), under the supervision of the writer Dionys Mascolo. Initially printed in approximately two thousand copies, the number later reached five thousand.(17)The first issue was published in September 1958, and it was a monthly publication distributed by network members among certain political and cultural figures, as well as activists in leftist parties, communists, and committed Christians opposed to war and colonialism.

The "Johnson" network also ensured the safe passage of Algerian activists, particularly those imprisoned, after organizing their escape from prison. This included facilitating their transfer from one prison to another and guaranteeing their departure from French territory. In addition, the network raised funds for the revolution. The "Johnson" network comprised between 2,000 and 3,000 members who joined out of conviction, whether ideological, intellectual, or political.(18)They included intellectuals, professors, journalists, writers, and artists of various kinds, such as singers, comedians, and producers, thus forming the elite of French society. After the network's discovery, the French public became aware of it when the French press reported on it in February 1960. Also noteworthy in this context is the "Henri Curiel" network, which operated in parallel with the "Johnson" network. It continued the "Johnson" network's activities after its dismantling, particularly in transferring funds to the National Liberation Front (FLN) Federation in France.

4. Guerrilla operations of the National Liberation Front Federation within French territory:

Following the establishment of the Fifth Republic under De Gaulle, characterized by its militaristic tendencies and full mobilization, the Algerian army deployed significant military resources and intensified its military operations to suppress the revolution. The leaders of the Algerian War of Independence (the Coordination and Implementation Committee) then conceived a plan to task the National Liberation Front Federation in France with carrying out large-scale operations within French territory.(19) This was a highly precise strategic plan to guide the course of the liberation revolution, aiming to destabilize France and force the French government to keep the bulk of its troops stationed on French soil to protect sensitive French installations from sabotage. This would, in turn, deter France from sending more troops and military equipment to Algeria, thus reducing the intensity of the war, which would ultimately benefit the National Liberation Army.

Omar Boudaoud was appointed head of the Fourth Federation of the National Liberation Front (FLN) in France. He was strict in his responsibilities and bound by the orders and directives of the Coordination and Implementation Committee.(20) He established armed cells specifically for combat operations, assigning their leadership to Ahmed Doum. Later, Abdelkrim Souissi expanded the Federation's activities, particularly in the area of armament, to ensure the FLN cells remained strong and effective in the face of constant surveillance and harassment by the French authorities. In this context, Abdelkrim Souissi sent one of its members, Salim Riad, on a mission to Italy. Riad successfully negotiated an arms deal, securing an initial shipment of high-quality Beretta pistols at a very reasonable price. This operation, known at the time as "Operation Beretta," was a significant step that demonstrated the capabilities of the FLN Federation. In addition, other operations were carried out to destabilize France within its territories, operations that garnered widespread international condemnation.(21) These operations included:

4.1 The August 25, 1958 guerrilla operations in France:

These operations were the result of a careful study of the situation and its consequences by the Coordination and Implementation Committee. The Committee then issued the order to the Federation for implementation. The Federation, in turn, summoned the officials of the provinces and major departments to a meeting in mid-July 1958 in Cologne-Mulheim in Germany.(22)Those present included Omar Boudaoud as head of the Federal Committee, Said Bouaziz as head of the Special Organization, Ali Haroun as head of Information, Training, and Defense of the Rights of Detainees, Kaddour El Adlani as head of Administrative and Political Organization, Abdelkrim Souissi as head of Administration and Finance, in addition to Moussa Kabayli as head of the First Province, Hamada Haddad as head of the Second Province, Amour Ghazali as head of the Third Province, Ismail Menna as head of the Fourth Province, and Bachir Boumaza as head of the lawyers' association formed by the National Liberation Front to support Algerians detained in French prisons. For a whole week, everyone discussed the possibility of opening a second front to confront France on its territory, after each state president presented his material and human capabilities. Tasks were distributed to the participants in an atmosphere of enthusiasm and desire for armed action, and a plan for operations was prepared during the night of August 24-25, 1958, and zero hour was set as the date for the start of operations that spread throughout the French territory.(23)

At midnight, several economic and military targets were attacked. These operations targeted oil refineries, oil depots, economic centers, weapons factories, and military installations. These attacks took place in numerous areas, including Marseille, Toulouse, Fronten, Grenoble, and Le Havre. Forest fires were also set in the Côte d'Azur region and near Martigues. In the Parisian suburbs, military installations were vandalized, and a fuel factory and depot in Évry and a police garage in Paris were burned. A cartridge factory in Vincennes was also targeted. In the suburbs adjacent to Marseille, fuel tanks were set ablaze, with flames reaching nearby administrative buildings. This forced police to evacuate entire neighborhoods.(24)The war manifested itself throughout France: in the streets of Paris, in the French countryside, around industrial centers, ports, and airports. The consequences were extremely serious, forcing the French government to mobilize police forces and enlist the army. All sensitive locations, such as railway junctions, major bridges, iron and steel plants, oil refineries, ports, dams, and transport hubs, were placed under direct military guard. Officially, 80,000 soldiers, transferred from French army units stationed in Algeria, were assigned to this surveillance task. Police intensified their patrols, raids, and arrests, and a curfew was imposed on North African citizens, effective August 25, 1958. The toll was as follows: between August 24 and September 27, 56 acts of sabotage and 242 attacks against 181 targets were recorded, resulting in 82 deaths and 118 injuries on both sides.(25)Thousands of Algerians were imprisoned and detained.

These operations continued until the Provisional Government instructed the Federation leadership to halt guerrilla operations in June 1960. However, members of the Federation did not completely cease military operations in response to the armed attacks carried out by the extremist French Secret Army Organization (OAS) against the Algerian community in France, not to mention the repressive practices of the French police, which had a significant impact. In Algeria, these operations were warmly welcomed into the ranks of the National Liberation Army (ALN), providing a much-needed boost. In France, however, these operations dominated the media for a long period, prompting a concerted effort to prevent further deterioration of the situation(26)

4.2 Demonstrations of October 17, 1961:

These demonstrations fall within the strategy of the liberation revolution, which chose from the beginning to impose its presence on the Algerian reality through armed action, and in parallel to transferring that action to France, where the Federation of the National Liberation Front intensified its activity in this field, with a comprehensive mobilization of Algerian immigrants. The French government took a series of increasingly horrific measures of repression and torture, in addition to the announcement by the Paris police chief, Maurice Papon, that the fifth of October 1961 would be the beginning of imposing a curfew on Algerian immigrants from 5:30 pm until 5 am, as well as prohibiting gatherings of more than three people.(27) Given that most of the National Liberation Front's activities in France take place at night, the Federation realized the extent of the danger and consequences of this decision after all the reports from the provinces agreed that the curfew would paralyze all the activities of the National Liberation Front. It was necessary for the Federal Committee to think carefully about the matter and take an organized and practical response, so it decided to organize peaceful demonstrations according to a three-day work program. On the first day, men and women demonstrate in the streets of Paris starting at 7 pm, accompanied by their children, demanding negotiations with the Provisional Government of the Algerian Republic. On the following day, women demonstrate to demand the release of their husbands and children, whom the Federation assumed would be arrested on the first day. On the third day, workers and merchants hold a general strike to express their solidarity with the demonstrators and their families.(28)

The Algerian community responded to the call of the National Liberation Front (FLN) on the appointed date, and on October 17, more than thirty thousand demonstrators marched through the streets of Paris, chanting the slogan "Algeria is Algerian." However, Maurice Papon ordered the police, reinforced by an additional force of 7,000 individuals, to thwart and suppress the peaceful demonstrations. Tear gas was used, batons were beaten, and live ammunition was fired indiscriminately. The city's alleys were filled with the bodies of demonstrators who were thrown, alive and dead, into the Seine River, whose waters ran red with the blood of the martyrs, whose number reached 327. Some were burned alive, and 120 others were thrown into the Mediterranean Sea during the deportation operation that affected approximately 1,500 Algerians. Seventy were hanged in the Bois de Boulogne-Vinson, and forty were killed in cold blood at the bus station in the municipality of Clichy. And Nanterre, not to mention the thousands of wounded and arrested. Nevertheless, the demonstrations of October 17, 1961 achieved a victory, as they contributed to accelerating the pace of negotiations between the Provisional Government of the Algerian Republic and colonial France, and they also had a positive global impact that exceeded all expectations.(29)

4.3 The November 1, 1961 Strike:

The National Liberation Front (FLN) Federation in France ordered its detainees and prisoners to go on a hunger strike, coinciding with a United Nations General Assembly meeting. This historic strike lasted twenty days and resonated throughout the UN. The General Assembly changed its agenda item to discuss the "situation of Algerian prisoners in France," prompting the French delegation, headed by Pierre-August, to leave after expressing its displeasure. The UN called on France to recognize the rights of the Algerian detainees and urged it to find a political solution to the conflict with the FLN through direct negotiations. The strike achieved remarkable results, leading to a clear improvement in the conditions of Algerian detainees.(30)The Committee of Prisoners' Representatives played a crucial role in its success by fully managing it in every prison or detention center. For its part, the Federation coordinated between the various detention sites, organizing international support through the Provisional Government of the Algerian Republic, which significantly contributed to the success of this international support.

5. CONCLUSION

In this way, the Algerian community, within the framework of the National Liberation Front Federation in France, contributed to organizing and mobilizing the Algerian immigrant public to serve their national cause and to destabilize the French government in its own backyard, thanks to the tight coordination and continuous consultation of the wise leadership of the revolution, which supported it with sound decisions and ideas through which it was able to gain sympathizers and supporters for the Algerian liberation revolution from different nationalities, especially European ones. This made the federation able to control the management of its affairs firmly and steadily thanks to the harmony prevailing among its members, the awareness and belief in the national cause, and its embrace by the Algerian community in France, until the achievement of national independence and the liberation of the Algerian people from the brutal French colonialism.

6. Marginalization :

(1) Abdelhamid Zouzo, Immigration and its role in the Algerian national movement between the two wars 1919-1939, Algeria, page 13.

(2) Yahya Bouaziz, The Policy of Colonial Domination and the Algerian National Movement 1830-1954, Alam Al-Maarefa Publishing and Distribution, Algeria 2009, page 47.

(3) Yahya Bouaziz, Ibid, page 17

(4) Mouhammed al-Arabi al-Zubayri, Contemporary History of Algeria, Vol. 4, Dar al-Maktaba Publishing, Algeria 2018, p. 45.

(5) Abdul Hamid Zouzou, Op.cit, page 22

(6) Saadi Bouziane, The Role of the Working Class Abroad in the November 1954 Revolution, The Political and Militant History of Algerian Workers Abroad from the North African Star to Independence, Houma Press, Algeria, Second Edition 2008, Page 81.

(7) Ibid, p 83.

(8) Dahou Djerbal, Special Organization of the French Federation of the National Liberation Front, History of the Armed Struggle of the National Liberation Front 1956-1962, Al-Shihab Publications 2013, p 40.

(9) Mohand Akli Benyounes, the Algerian guerrilla in France 1954-1962, sept in the fight. Casbah Edition, Algeria 2012, p16.

(10) Linda Amri, The Battle of France, The Algerian War in France, translated by Foudil Boumala, Al-Shihab Publications, 2013, p 27.

(11) In L'Echo d'Alger, "La situation des ouvriers Algériens au Métropole", numéro 15654, on October 8, 1954.

(12) Omar Boudaoud, Five Years at the Head of the Federation of France, From the Algerian People's Party to the National Liberation Front, Dar El Kasbah, Algeria 2007, p. 98

(13) Saidi Meziane, Op.cit, page 87

(14) Dahou Jarbal, Op.cit, page 48

(15) Ahmed Sari, Personalities and Issues from the Contemporary History of Algeria, Arab Press, Ghardaia 2004, page 156.

(16) Ali Haroun, The Seventh Historical Wilaya, The FLN War Inside French Territory, 1954-1962, Dar El Qasba Publishing, Algeria 2007, p. 18

(17) Dahou Jarbal, Op.cit, page 51

(18) Mohand Akli Ben Younes, Op.cit, P 21

(19) Jumaa Ben Zaroual, The Algerian National Movement of Messali and its Position on the Revolution 1954-1962, PhD thesis in the History of the Algerian Revolution, supervised by Dr. Youssef Manasriya, Faculty of Arts and Humanities, University of Hadj Lakhdar, Batna, Academic Year 2002-2003, page 63

(20) Si Lakhdar Bouragaa, Witness to the Assassination of Thawra, 1st Edition, Dar Al Hikma for Translation and Publishing, Algeria 1990, p. 23.

(21) Samia Ben Fatima, Algerian Immigrants and the War of Liberation 1954-1962: Immigrants to France as a Case Study, PhD Thesis, supervised by Boubekour Hafedh Allah, specialization in Contemporary Algerian History, Department of History and Archaeology, Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, Larbi Tebessi University, Tebessa, 2017-2018, p. 56

(22) Nacer Eddine Ait Mokhtar, The guerre of Algeria in France 1956-1962, memories and contributions, Edition chihab 2017, p. 31.

(23) Ali Haroun, Op.cit, p. 31

(24) Omar Boudaoud, Op.cit, p. 113

(25) Muhammad Harbi, The Algerian Revolution, Years of Labor, translated by Najib Mayad, Saleh Al-Mathlouthi, National Foundation for Printing Arts, Algeria, 1994, p. 11.

(26) Nacer Edine Ait Mokhtar, Op.cit, P 42.

(27) Mohamed Lebjaoui, Version of the Algerian Revolution, Gallimard Edition, Paris 1970, p. 75

(28) Ali Haroun, Op.cit, page 72

(29) Mohand Akli Ben Younes, Op.cit, p. 82

(30) Samia Ben Fatima, Op.cit, page 98

7. Bibliography List :

1. Books :- Ali Haroun, The Seventh Historical Wilaya: The National Liberation Front's War on French Soil, 1954-1962, with an appendix by Mohamed Boudiaf, translated by Sadek Amari and Mustafa Madi. Dar El Qasba Publishing, Algeria, 2012.

- Mohand Akli BenYounes, the French army in Algeria 1954-1962, after the war, Casbah Edition, Algeria 2012;

- - Nacer Eddine Ait Mokhtar, the guerre of Algeria in France, 1956-1962, memoirs and combats, Chihab Edition, 2017);

- Mohamed Lebjaoui, review of the Algerian revolution, Gallimard Edition, Paris 1970;

- - Achour Cherfi, Dictionary of the Algerian Revolution, 1954-1962, translated by Alem Mokhtar, Dar El Qasba Publishing, Algeria, 2007.

- Dahou Djerbal, The Special Organization of the French Federation of the National Liberation Front, El Shihab Publications, 2012.

- Abdel Rahman Meziane Cherif, The Algerian War in France, Dar El Hikma, 2012. 5) Ahmed Sari, Personalities and Issues from the History of Contemporary Algeria, Arab Press, Ghardaia, 2004.

- Sabah Nouri Hadi and Hanan Talal Jassim, Organizations of Migrant Workers and Students and Their Role in the Algerian Resistance Against French Colonialism, College of Basic Education, University of Diyala, Iraq, 2011.

- Saidi Beziane, The Role of the Working Class in Exile in the November 1954 Revolution: The Political and Militant History of Algerian Workers in Exile from the North African Star to Independence.

- Linda Amayri, The Battle of France: The Algerian War in France, translated by Fadil Boumala, Al-Shihab Publications, 2013.

- Abdelhamid Zouzo, Immigration and its role in the Algerian national movement between the two wars 1919-1939, Algeria, page 13.

- Yahya Bouaziz, The Policy of Colonial Domination and the Algerian National Movement 1830-1954, Alam Al-Maarefa Publishing and Distribution, Algeria 2009, page 47.

- Muhammad al-Arabi al-Zubayri, Contemporary History of Algeria, Vol. 4, Dar al-Maktaba Publishing, Algeria 2018, p. 45.
- Saadi Bouziane, The Role of the Working Class Abroad in the November 1954 Revolution, The Political and Militant History of Algerian Workers Abroad from the North African Star to Independence, Houma Press, Algeria, Second Edition 2008, Page 81.
- Dahou Djerbal, Special Organization of the French Federation of the National Liberation Front, History of the Armed Struggle of the National Liberation Front 1956-1962, Al-Shihab Publications 2013, page 40.

2. Theses: Jumaa Ben Zaroual, The Algerian National Movement of Messali and its Position on the Revolution 1954-1962, PhD thesis in the History of the Algerian Revolution, supervised by Dr. Youssef Manasriya, Faculty of Arts and Humanities, University of Hadj Lakhdar, Batna, Academic Year 2002-2003

- Samia Ben Fatima, Algerian Immigrants and the War of Liberation 1954-1962: Immigrants to France as a Case Study, PhD Thesis, supervised by Boubekour Hafedh Allah, specialization in Contemporary Algerian History, Department of History and Archaeology, Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences, Larbi Tebessi University, Tebessa

3. Journal article : In L'Echo d'Alger, "La situation des ouvriers Algeriens au Mètropole", numéro 15654, on October 8, 1954