Linguistic and Syntactic Structure Analysis in the Poetry of the Ancient Arabic Umayyad Era Poet (Suraqa Ibn Mirdas Al-Barqi)

Abstract

This research deals with the poetry investigation of an ancient Umayyad poet, Suraqa ibn Mirdas al-Barqi. It has relied on the historical approach to study the poet's era and its political and social circumstances, in addition to the descriptive-analytical approach, which is based on observing the poet's artistic images and highlighting the areas of beauty in them, to sense his artistic ability to highlight those images. Various sources were drawn from and relied on, including literary books. It has been mentioned in the introduction that the collection of his poetry, (Layers Stallions Poets), (Al-Umdah in Mahasin poet, its Etiquette and Criticism), (Al-Aghani), and others. The introduction illuminated the poet's political, social, and intellectual era. It has been dealt with the structure of the poetic text, supporting it with established table. Then the words, structures, and poetic music. As for his words, the research concluded that they were consistent with the purpose and psychological reality of the poet, and that they were rich and solid, along with clarity, ease, and a lack of artificiality. In addition to that, the words of pride and war dominate his collection of poems, and he relied on the language of the Holy Quran, so he used many of its vocabulary and images, which were a rich and inexhaustible source from which he also derived his poetic images and employed them in the service of the text. Likewise, the heritage of proverbs, wisdom, and Arabic poetry was another source that the poetry of his collection included.

تحليل البنية اللغوية والنحوية في شعر الشاعر العربي القديم من العصر الأموي (سراقة بن مرداس البارقي)

المستخلص

يتناول هذا البحث دراسة شعر الشاعر الأموي القديم سراقة بن مرداس البارقي. وقد اعتمد على المنهج التاريخي لدراسة عصر الشاعر وظروفه السياسية والاجتماعية، بالإضافة إلى المنهج الوصفي التحليلي، الذي يقوم على رصد الصور الفنية للشاعر وإبراز جوانب الجمال فيها، لاستشعار قدرته الفنية على إبراز تلك الصور. وقد استقيت مصادر متنوعة، من بينها كتب أدبية. وقد ذكر في المقدمة أن من بين دواوينه الشعرية: (طبقات من الشعراء)، (العمدة في محاسن الشاعر وآدابه ونقده)، (الأغاني)، وغيرها. وقد أوضحت المقدمة العصر السياسي والاجتماعي والفكري للشاعر، وتناولت بنية النص الشعري، مدعومة بجدول مُعدّ مسبقاً، ثم الكلمات والبنية والموسيقى الشعرية. أما كلماته، فقد خلص البحث إلى أنها كانت متسقة مع غاية الشاعر وحقيقته النفسية، وأنها كانت غنية ومتينة، تتسم بالوضوح والسهولة والعفوية. إضافة إلى ذلك، غلبت كلمات الكبرياء والحرب على مجموعته الشعرية، واعتمد على لغة القرآن الكريم، فاستخدم العديد من مفرداته وصوره، التي كانت مصدراً ثرياً لا ينضب استقى منه صورته الشعرية ووظفها في خدمة النص. كذلك، كان تراث الأمثال والحكمة والشعر العربي مصدراً آخر استقى منه شعر مجموعته.

Introduction

Suraqa Ibn Mirdas Al-Barqi bibliography

He is Suraqa bin Mirdas bin Asma bin Khalid bin Al-Harith bin Auf bin Amr bin Saad bin Tha'laba bin Kinanah bin Barq (Al-Isfahani, 2008). He grew up and lived there (in Barq, which is a Saudi governorate located in the Asir region in the southwest of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia), see fig. 1. He learned poetry early on from his grandfather, Asma bin Khalid Al-Barqi. He came with his people to Barq to the Messenger Muhammad (peace and blessings be upon him) when he was a young man in the year 9 AH. He migrated with his father and some of his people to Iraq and settled in Kufa. Ibn Asakir mentions that he lived during the era of prophecy and witnessed the Battle of Yarmouk in the year 15 AH (Asakir, 1988). As for his birth, the sources did not mention anything about it, as they did not touch upon his biography except for a few pieces of information, which prompted the researcher of the Diwan of Al-Barqi, Hussein Nassar, in his talk about the poet's life, to say: "I searched for news about Suraqa to find out who he was? What was his era, and what was his status among his people and the people of his time? I began to turn over books of lectures, encyclopedias, literary collections, and the moments in which it was likely that someone would write something about him, or quote some verses from his poetry. Then I found a strange phenomenon: the neglect of Suraqa by the ancients, almost complete neglect, as he was not mentioned in most of the books, and what was mentioned was a brief, extremely brief allusion" (Al-Barqi, 1947). In another place, Hussein Nassar mentions that he could not know anything about the birth of Suraqa al-Barqi except what could be deduced from what he said in his poetry (Al-Barqi, 1947).

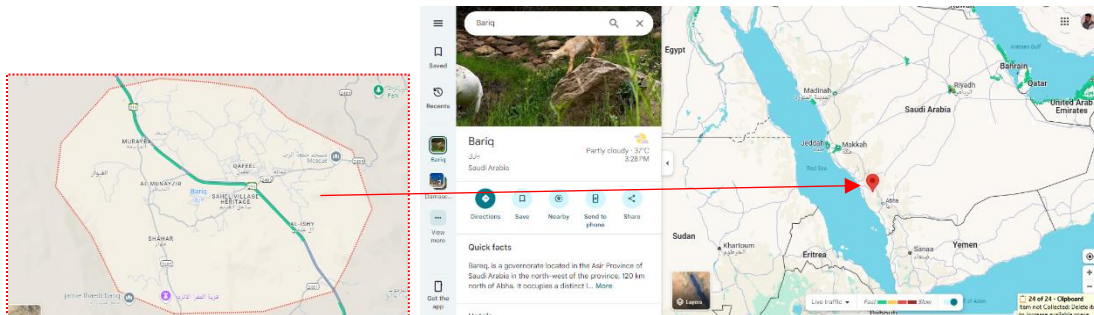

Fig. 1 Barqi city location on Google Maps.

Then, after that, he determines the first appearance of our poet, as he says: "It appears to us that Suraqa, when he first appeared, was in the year 66 AH, fighting al-Mukhtar, revolting against him with the nobles of Kufa, shortly after he had seized control of its province. But al-Mukhtar did not take long to suppress the revolution and arrest its leaders, including Suraqa. He ordered their imprisonment, and Suraqa apologized to him and praised him, saying:

(The Abundant Sea)

نزوننا نزوةً كانت علينا
وكان خروجنا بطراً وحيناً
بكل كتيبة تنعى حسيناً
يوم الشعب إذ لاقى حُنيناً
سأشكُرُ إن جعلت العفو ديناً

"ألا ابْلُغْ أبا إسحاق أنَّا
خرجنا لا نرى الضعفاء شيئاً
نصرت على عدوك كل يومٍ
كنصر محمدٍ في يوم بدرٍ
تقبل توبةً مني فإني

"Shall I not inform Abu Ishaq (al-Mukhtar al-Thaqafi) that we set out on a whim that was upon us

We went out, not seeing the weak as anything, and our going out was arrogant and shameful.

You have given victory over your enemy daily with every battalion mourning Husayn.

Like the victory of Muhammad on the day of Badr, on the day of the people, when they met Hunayn Accept my repentance, for I will be grateful if you make forgiveness a debt (Al-Barqi, 1947)".

Suraqa al-Barqi, as some sources mention, was a witty poet, beloved by kings, a good singer, a sweet-talker, and distinguished by his lightheartedness and high status (Al-Jumahi, 1999). Several stories indicate his wit, including his incident with al-Mukhtar al-Thaqafī when he wanted to kill him. His poetic pieces show that he was also very proud of his tribe, Barqi, and fanatical about it, after Islam had wiped out fanaticism, but it returned in the time of the Umayyads, thanks to the policy they adopted, which was the policy of division between the tribes. Among the poems in which he shows pride is his saying:

(The Abundant Sea)

"أَبَتْ عَيْنِ ابْنِ عَمِّكَ أَنْ تَنَامَا بِجَنْبِ الطِّفِّ وَاحْتَمَمَا"

"Your cousin's eyes refused to sleep beside Karbala and sought refuge (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

Whoever notices this poem and looks at its verses will find that Al-Barqi did not limit his pride to his tribe only, but rather included all the Yemeni tribes. This Azd is mentioned in his saying:

(The Abundant Sea)

"وَقَدْ أَحْمِي الْحَقِيقَةَ كُلَّ يَوْمٍ وَتَحْمِي الْأَزْدَ أَنْفَى أَنْ أَرَامَا"

"I protect the truth daily, and Azd protects my nose, Arama (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

It was Suraqa and this is Madhhij, which he mentioned in his saying:

(The Abundant Sea)

"وَمَذْحَجَ إِذَا تَقَرَّبَهُمْ جَمِيعاً رَأَيْتَ قُرُومَ مَذْحَجْنَا عَظَامَا"

"And Madhhij, when you bring them all together, you will see the great men of Madhhij (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

Thus, he continues to mention the Yemeni tribes with praise and mention of their noble qualities. Hussein Nassar mentions that because of this extreme fanaticism and this wild exaggeration, he was given the title of Poet of Azd or Poet of Yemen during that period (Al-Barqi, 1947).

Al-Zarkali tells us that after Suraqa was released from Al-Mukhtar's prison, he went to Mus'ab bin Al-Zubayr in Basra and Damascus. Then he returned to Iraq with Bishr bin Marwan, the governor of Kufa at that time, after Al-Mukhtar was killed. When Al-Hajjaj bin Yusuf took over Iraq, Suraqa satirized him and sought him out. He fled to Al-Sham and died there in 79 AH (Al-Zarkali, 2002).

His Poetry

When examining the poetry of Saraqa al-Barqi, we find that he composed poetry in eight themes: sympathy, wisdom, enthusiasm, pride, praise, satire, and description. Satire constitutes the largest proportion of the collection topics, followed by the topic of elegy (Al-Barqi, 1947). We must investigate the topics of the collection, even if only briefly, and we will begin with the topic of itching and the slander of Al-Barqi. He begins with advice on family matters, so he advises marriage to a woman of good character and religion, as he says:

(The Simple Sea)

"لا تطلبين فتاةً من وسامتها ما لم يوافقك منها الدين والخلق"

"Don't ask a girl for her beauty unless her religion and morals match yours (Al-Barqi, 1947)".

Contemplating the verse takes us to the Islamic view of the noble prophetic Hadith: "A woman is married for four reasons: her wealth, her lineage, her beauty, and her religion. So marry the religious one, and may your hands be covered with dust" Al-Kulayni, 2007).

Description

The second purpose for which he wrote and excelled in his field is the subject of description, in which he surpassed his peers, especially in describing horses. Hussein Nassar mentions that the collection contains only one poem describing horses, but it is long and only deals with that description. He began it by saying (Al-Barqi, 1947):

(The Complete Sea)

زَعمت ربيعةً وهي غير ملومة	أنى كبرت وإن رأسي أشيب
وجعلته دون العيال شتاءه	حتى أنجلي وهو الدخيل المقرب
والقبض حين اصوئه في ظلة	وحشيها قبل الغروب منقب
وله ثلاث لقائح في يومه	ونخيرهُ مع ليله متأوب

"Rabia claimed, without blame: "How old I became, even though my head was gray.

And I made him my winter without my family, until he left, and he was the closest stranger.

And the fist, when I protect it in the shade and its stuffing before sunset is pierced.

And he has three pregnancies in a day, and his snoring at night is repentant" (Al-Barqi, 1947)".

The description as mentioned by the researcher of the collection, and what came in the poem where he says: "Then he moves on to describe his horse in a detailed and precise description, taking in every part of his body and showing it to us in the best way, and how similar Suraqa is in this position to a camera, focusing its eye on that great, massive horse, and depicting it for us, coming and going... It does not leave out anything small or big, except that it reveals it in its scenes and in the best way" (Al-Barqi, 1947).

Satire

It is the poet's greatest purpose, of two types: antitheses and ordinary satire. The antitheses are with Jarir, then with Al-Farazdaq; ordinary satire is directed at Al-Mukhtar, Katheer, and the northern tribes. Among these is his saying:

(The Long Sea)

"فإن أهجُ يربوعاً فإني لا أرى لشيخهم الاقصى على ناشئ فضلاً"

"If I satirize a jerboa, I see no superiority for their sheikh over a young man (Al-Barqi, 1947)".

In another place, he satirized the tribe of Kulayb, saying:

(The Complete Sea)

"إنَّ الفرزدقَ برزتَ حلباتُهُ عفواً وغودر في الغبار جريزُ اضرب عليهم في الجوارحِ حلقةً تبقى فإن إياهم محذورُ"

"Al-Farazdaq's arenas have been exposed

Excuse me, and Jarir has been left in the dust

Strike them in the hollows with a ring

Stay, because leaving them is dangerous (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

He did not stop at this point, as at the time when Al-Farazdaq preferred to satirize him in another place, saying:

(The Complete Sea)

"قد كنتُ أحسبُ يابنَ قينَ مجاشعٍ إن قد خصاك فلا تغطَّ جديرُ"

"O son of Qayn, I thought you were a Mujashi`. If he has singled you out, do not cover up the one worthy (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

What has been noticed is that in this verse, Suraqa mentioned the title Jarir gave to Al-Farazdaq, by which he became famous: "Ibn Al-Qain".

As for his normal satire, it is clear in his satire of Al-Mukhtar Al-Thaqafi with lies and pretense, and he calls for fighting him, as he says (Al-Barqi, 1947):

(The Abundant Sea)

"كفرت بوحكم وجعلت نذرا علي قتالكم حتى الممات إذا قالوا أقول لهم: كذبتهم وإن خرجوا لبست لهم أداتي"

"I disbelieved in your revelation. I made a vow. I will fight you until death
If I say, I will say to them: You have lied
And they turned away. I wore my equipment for them. "

Hussein Nassar comments on Suraqa's satire, saying: "We see from this that the image of satire in Suraqa is the image of pre-Islamic tribal satire that did not change much, except in his satire of Al-Mukhtar and his mention of revelation and religion" (Al-Barqi, 1947).

As for the topic of pride, it was not far from the poet, and this topic mixed with praise, elegy, satire, and other purposes, and a poet boasts about himself and his people from Azd and Yemen as brave warriors, and from that he says (Al-Barqi, 1947):

(The Complete Sea)

"قومي شنوءة إن سألت بمجدهم ف صالح الأقوام او لم تسأل وماثر كانت لهم معلومة في الصالحين وسؤدد لم يُنحل"

"My people are ugly if you ask about their glory.
The righteous people are good, or you do not ask.
And their exploits were known among the righteous, and their leadership was not diminished. "

Lament

Elegy in Suraqa's case is no different from the elegy of others, as Hussein Nassar says "What I noticed through my study of the poet's collection of poems is that he did not elegy for anyone who died a natural death, but rather all those he elegyed for were leaders who were killed in war, and they were either from Barq or Azd, so he elegyed for them as (the poet of Azd), and from that he said (Al-Barqi, 1947):

(The Long Sea)

أعيني جودا بالدموع السواكب وكونا كواحي شنة مع راكب
وكنّا بخير قبل قتل ابن مخنف وكل امرئ يوماً لبعض المذاهب

"My eyes are filled with tears, Juda. We were like a bag full of camels with a rider. We were fine before the killing of Ibn Makhnaf. Every person has a different opinion on a day."

Methodology and discussion

Poetic Text Construction

Tracing Suraqa's poetic output, which is included in his collection of poems, it has been found that it is confined to two forms of artistic construction:

- 1- The piece structure.
- 2- The poem structure.

The Piece Structure

Ibn Rasheeq referred to the piece as: (If it reaches seven verses, then it is a poem... and some people do not consider a poem unless it reaches ten or exceeds them, even if it is one verse) (Al-Qayrawani, 1981). Some of them are called a verse or two verses (al-nataf) (Al-Ubaidi, 1986), and based on that, the piece can be from three to ten verses. Ibn Rasheeq believes that the piece (enters the ears, and wanders in the gatherings...) (Al-Qayrawani, 1981). Suraqa's collection of poems includes 13 pieces, each comprising 70 verses, while the fragments total five pieces, each comprising eight verses. According to this, the number of pieces outnumbers the number of poems, but the number of verses in the poems outnumbers the number of verses in the fragments and plucking, see Table 1.

Table (1)Saraqa's poems collection purposes, pieces, plucks, and verses.

Purpose	No. of pieces	No. of verses	No. of plucks	No. of verses
Lament	2	13	-	-

pride and enthusiasm	1	7	1	1
Wisdom	1	3	2	4
Satire	4	18	-	-
Apology	1	10	1	1
Praise	3	15	-	-
Description	1	4	-	-
Other topics	-	-	1	2
Total	13	70	5	8

From table 1, his pieces revolved around all the poetic genres his collection of poems dealt with, from pride and satire, etc. The prevalence of this phenomenon in Suraqa's poetry is because these pieces are in line with the nature of the political and military life that the poet lived, and in the shadow of the wars in which he participated, as he expressed through them his opinions and positions towards every event (Al-Barqi, 1947).

Such circumstances pushed our poet to be brief, so his poetry was mostly small pieces in which he flowed naturally without examining the meaning, refining the word, or seeking scale or rhyme (Dayf, 1986).

One of the most prominent characteristics of these poetic pieces is that they dealt with a single subject through which they expressed a specific experience. They depicted a clear psychological situation in which the sincerity of feeling, clarity of emotion, and authenticity are evident. Thus, in these pieces, a thematic unity was achieved, accompanied by a sincere experience that the poet could express clearly, far from affectation and artifice. He was also freed from inherited artistic traditions, such as traditional introductions, descriptions of the journey, and the main theme and the conclusion.

The poet enters into the topic or idea he wants to express without traditional introductions, as in his piece praising Al-Mukhtar and begging him to release him from captivity. He began by apologizing for his rebellion against Al-Mukhtar, describing it as a whim and rashness, saying:

"ألا أبلغ أبا اسحاق أنا
خرجنا لا نري الضعفاء شيئاً
نزونا نزوةً كانت علينا
وكان خروجنا بطراً وحيناً"

"Shall I not tell Abu Ishaq (Al-Mukhtar Al-Thaqafi) that we went out on a whim that was against us? We went out without showing the weak anything; our going out was insolent and arrogant (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

Then he attributes to Al-Mukhtar Al-Thaqafi the qualities of strength, courage, and justice, likening his victory to the victory of the Muslims on the day of Badr and Hunayn, to win Al-Mukhtar's heart and make him accept his apology, saying:

(The Abundant Sea)

وهم مثل الدبى حين التقينا	"نراهم في مصفهم قليلاً
رأينا القوم قد برزوا إلينا	برزنا إذ رأيناهم فلما
وطعنا صانباً حتى انتنينا	لقينا منهم ضرباً طلخفاً
بكل كتيبة تنعى حسينا	نصرت على عدوك كل يوم
ويوم الشعب إذ لاقى حنينا	كنصر محمد في يوم بدر

"We saw them in their ranks a little while ago, and they were like bears when we met

We came forward when we saw them, and when we saw the people had come forward to us

We encountered a light blow and accurate thrusts from them until we turned back

You are victorious over your enemy every day with every battalion mourning Husayn

Like the victory of Muhammad on the day of Badr and on the day of the ravine when he met Hunayn (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

But after this, he hopes for the forgiveness and pardon of Al-Mukhtar after his repentance is accepted, and he - that is, Suraqa - is grateful for that, so he says:

(The Abundant Sea)

"تَقْبَلُ تَوْبَةَ مَنْي فَاِنِي سَأَشْكُرُ إِن جَعَلْتَ الْعَفْوَ دَيْنًا كَذَاكَ تَرَى سَرَاقَةَ فَاصْطَنَعُهُ فَذَاكَ يَزِيدُ مِنْ عَادَاكَ شَيْنًا"

"Accept my repentance, for I will be grateful if you make forgiveness a debt. This is how you see Suraqa, so do it, for that will increase the ugliness of your enemy (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

Thus, the poet's treatment of a single subject or a specific event was subject to a single emotion that linked its successive parts, so the verses of the piece seemed related, one completing the other. This piece is one of many pieces included in Saraqa's collection, in which the unity of the subject and the tight connection between its verses are evident.

The Poem Structure

By this, it is meant the structure or framework of the poem. The poem's construction in Arabic poetry has been linked to certain traditions whose features have been established since the pre-Islamic era and passed down from poets throughout the ages. Perhaps Ibn Qutaybah was the earliest to draw attention to this (Abu Hilal, 1971). Studies indicate the importance of these inherited traditions of the ancient Arabic poem. The skilled poet is the one who (strives to improve the introduction, the methodology, and then the conclusion, as these are the situations that attract the ears of the audience and entice them to listen) (Al-Jurjani, 1973).

Upon examining Suraqa's poem collection, he constructed his poems in two ways: A- The poem proportion to be completed. B- The poem structure with a single poetic theme.

The poet's collection of poems is in total of seven poems, distributed among the themes of elegy, pride, description, and satire. After reviewing Saraqa's poem collection, it became clear that his poems were sometimes long and sometimes short, with some exceeding fifty verses (Al-Barqi, 1947), while the longest poem in his collection contained eighty verses (Al-Barqi, 1947). The verses of his short poems ranged from thirteen verses (Al-Barqi, 1947) to thirty or thirty-three verses (Al-Barqi, 1947). This is because the Arabs tended (towards brevity and away from abundance) (Jinni).

The poem proportion to be completed

Suraqa's poems were arranged following the artistic characteristics of the fully constructed Arabic poem, which critics have pointed out, including the brilliance of the opening, the beauty of the conclusion, and the elegance of the ending. Some of his poems (Al-Barqi, 1947) were distinguished by their multiplicity of themes and their tendency toward detail and precise imagery. In his long Lamiya verse, he followed the approach of the pre-Islamic poem, beginning it with a mention of the separation of loved ones who had severed the bond of affection by their separation, saying:

"إِنَّ الْأَحِبَّةَ آذَنُوا بِتَرْحَلٍ وَبَصْرَمِ حَبْلِكَ بَاكِرًا فَتَحْمَلِ"

"The beloved ones have announced your departure and the early severing of your rope, so bear it (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

After studying the poet's poem collection, the poem sections are identified as follows:

Opening and Introduction

The openings and introductions of poets' poems received great attention from Arab critics, who paid great attention to them and pointed out the best of them and found them to be most desirable.

Critics' interest in the introductions of poems stems from their being "the first thing that strikes the ear and indicates the poet's intentions at first glance" (Al-Qayrawani, 1981).

The introductions to Suraqa's poems were characterized by their imitation and emulation of traditional pre-Islamic introductions, but with quick verses that sometimes did not exceed one or two verses, and at other times, they were distinguished by their length.

He began some of his poems with erotic rhymes, and some with ruins. When he satirized Jarir, he began his opposite with an introduction to his ruins, stopping at the ruins. He likened the houses to the lines of a book in their blackness and antiquity. This introduction aroused in him pride in his strength and courage, so he said:

"لَمَنْ الدِّيارُ كَأَنَّهُنَّ سَطُورُ قَفَرٌ عَفْتُهُ رِوَامِسٌ وَدُهُورُ تَخْشَى رَبِيعَةً إِنْ أَلَمَ بِدَارِهَا وَكَأَنَّنِي بِطَلابِهَا مَأْمُورُ"

"For whom are the homes like lines of a desert, whose ruins are covered by mountains and ages Rabia fears I will come to her home, as if I am ordered to seek her out (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

Suraqa tried to reconcile the introduction and the subject, and he excelled in preparing for the satire. The poet might begin his poem by mentioning his gray hair and old age, which were the reasons for the girls' abandonment of him and their aversion to him. However, the poet made gray hair a means of pride, so he showed that the girls did not abandon him until his enemies feared that Barq's virgins would grow up and he would marry them, and they would give birth to brave sons who would fight her. He says:

"زعمت ربيعة وهي غير ملومة
ورأت عذاري أدركت في بارق وترهب
أنني كبرت وأن رأسي أشيب
فتخاف من هول الجنان

ويشفها ان لا تزال يروعها
بكرت تعرض نفسها أو ثيب.

"Rabia claimed, without blame, that I had grown old and that my hair was gray.

She saw virgins who had reached maturity in Barq, and she feared the horrors of Paradise and was terrified.

It was a shame that she would not be frightened by a virgin exposing herself or a widow (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

After examining the poet's texts, it became clear that most of his introductions-three out of four-avoided the words "ala," "khalili," and "qad" (because they are signs of weakness) (Al-Qayrawani, 1981).

Innovate Riddance

It is a technique used by the poet to transition from one meaning to another without interruption. Ancient critics emphasized the importance of this technique and its impact on the poem's structure and the tight connection of its parts (Muhammad & al-Alawi, 2015). There are various methods of transition used by poets in transitioning from one theme to another. Upon examining the poet's poetry, this technique is evident in his poems, and despite their scarcity, they indicate that the poet was keen to make an appropriate transition from one theme to another.

In his antithesis, with which he responded to Jarir, he skillfully transitioned from his introduction, "The Ruins," to a satirical rebuke directed at Prince Bishr ibn Mardan, asking him for support and revenge against Jarir. In a verse he quoted from Jarir's poem in which he responded to Suraqa, "Some people call going out salvation and supplication" (Al-Qayrawani, 1981).

"ما بشر حُقَّ لوجهك التبشيرُ هَلَا غَضِبْتَ لَنَا وَأَنْتَ أَمِيرُ"

"What is the right of your face to give good news? Why don't you get angry on our behalf, you who are the prince? (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

The poet may move from his erotic introduction to his purpose - pride - with wisdom verses (Al-Barqi, 1947). He brings together much of his life experience and expertise, enhancing it with the human meanings and values he gained and the social customs and values he learned that prevailed in Arab society. He says:

"وأرى من الرأي المصيب ثباته
واستبق ودك للصديق ولا تقل
ودع الفواحش ما استطعت لأهلها
فافعل"
أن لا تصل حبلاً إذا لم تُوصَلِ
أبدًا لذي ضغنٍ مبينٍ أقبَلِ
وإذا هممت بأمرٍ صدقٍ

"I see that it is a sound opinion to be firm that you do not connect a rope if you do not connect it.

Keep your friendship with your friend and never tell someone clearly weak, "Come."

And leave the indecencies as much as you can to their people. And if you intend to do something sincere, do it (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

Through it, he demonstrates his stance on certain aspects of life and his views on many human meanings and values, human relationships, and ways of dealing and behaving among people. He charts a unique approach stemming from his psychology, nature, attitudes, and emotions, influenced by the circumstances and conditions surrounding him. The poet takes another approach to detach and transition from the introduction to the description with a verse of pride. He boasts of himself and his chivalry, saying:

"والخيل تعذلني على امساكها وتقولُ قد أهلكت ما لا يُحسبُ"

"The horses blame me for holding them back and say, you have destroyed more than can be counted (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

Then he began to describe the horse, saying:

"فحلفتُ لا تنفكُ عندي شطبةً جرداءُ أو سبَّطُ المشدة سلهبُ
سهبُ الجراءِ إذا عويَّتْ عنانهُ سُحْقُ إذا هضم الرعيلُ المُطَنَّبُ"

I swore that I would never let a scratch go away from me, barren, thin-skinned

If I raise its reins, the puppies' steppe will be crushed if the long-winded camel is destroyed (Al-Barqi, 1947).

Thus, the poet has achieved appropriate transitions in his poems.

Excellent Ending

The ending of the poem is one of the important sections of the ancient poem, and the ending have received the attention of critics, as they are (the basis of the poem, and the last thing that remains of it in the ears, and its path is to be perfect, and it is not possible to add to it, and nothing better than it comes after it, and if the beginning of the poem is a key to it, then the end must be a lock on it) (Al-Qayrawani, 1981).

The poet tried to find a suitable ending for his poems. He ended his poem in which he described the horse with verses in which he boasts of his knowledge and understanding of horses and their natures, and that his opinion on this matter is heard and taken into account, not only because of his knowledge of this, but also because of his status among people. His opinion has placed him in a high position among his people. He supported his statement with two verses of wisdom that prove this, saying:

"هذا لتعلمَ بارقٌ أني امرؤٌ لي في السوابقِ نظرةٌ لا تُكذبُ
 وتبينُ الامثالُ ما أحلامُهُم والحلمُ أردوهُ المُسامِ المُغربُ
 والناسُ منهم من يُعاشُ برأيه ومعذبٌ يشقى بهِ ويعذبُ"

"This is to let Barq know that I am a man, i have a view in previous records that don't lie

Proverbs show what their dreams are, the worst dream is the one that is dark and lonely

Some people live by their opinions, and a tormentor who makes him miserable and tormented (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

The ending of the poem was also an occasion to glorify himself after boasting about the Azd tribes, by emphasizing the great qualities that were evident in him. He gave a comprehensive picture of his position among poets and the soundness of his ruling opinion, and compared them to his poetic nature and the knowledge of his lineage. His opinions remain a constitution for them on every poetic issue in which they differ. He says:

"فماذا يبتغي الشعراء مني وقد قسّمتُ بينهم قساما قضيّت قضية فيهم فجازتُ بها يُقضى إذا احتكموا احتكاما"

*"What do poets want from me, I divided it among them
I decided a case against them, and it passed, It is decided by it if they resort to arbitration (Al-Barqi, 1947)"*

In this style - personal pride - Suraqa ended most of his poems. He may end his poems with verses of the same purpose for which he composed the poem. For example, in his poem satirizing Jarir, he ended with satire as well:

"لعمري لقد باع الفرزدق نفسه بوكس وجارى لا كفيا ولا فحلا"

"By God, Al-Farazdaq sold himself, A lame and it is running, neither enough nor a stallion (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

The poem structure with a single poetic theme

A unified theme and a lack of other topics characterize poems of this type (Al-Barqi, 1947). They are also short compared to his poems with multiple themes. They also lack the traditional introduction and preface: "He attacks what he wants, fighting back, and shakes hands" (Al-Qayrawani, 1981), thus entering directly into the subject.

Thus, our poet marshalled his artistic energy and performance ability. Perhaps the scarcity of introductions in Suraqa's poetry is due to the poet's involvement in the wars of his time and the prevalence of an enthusiastic spirit in his poetry. He was a proponent of quick, appropriate speech. This calls for composing the original theme without resorting to an introduction (Wahhab, 1983).

Also, a group of verses that resolve a single theme is found in his poems with a single poetic theme. Nothing would be disrupted in the poem's overall function and structure if it presented one verse before another. This indicates that each verse has an independent, structural unit, unified in tone and rhyme.

It is clear from the above that the most important aspect of the poetry's general structure in Saraqa's poem collection is that most of it was composed of fragments. Therefore, it was liberated from some of the artistic features of Arabic poetry in its traditional form, in addition to the presence of short and long poems in which the traditional artistic structure was represented in its most complete form, and others in which it departed from the traditional framework to something of novelty and innovation.

Words and Phrases

Words

Suraqa used Arabic to express his ideas, which always interested him and Arab critics. Given the importance of (the word and the meaning), they said: (The word is a body, and its soul is the meaning, and its connection to it is like the connection of the soul to the body, it is weakened by its weakness, and strengthened by its strength) (Al-Qayrawani, 1981). The poet's skill in using the language's vocabulary is evidence of his poetic skill. Accordingly, the Arabs, including the poets, were interested in the Arabic language, which was reflected in their poetry through the poet's choice of good, eloquent words appropriate to the situation. The poet's ability is evident through this characteristic of his personality, which differs and varies from one poet to another. "One poet's poetry is brilliant, while another's is stiff. One poet's speech is easy, while another's logic is difficult. This is according to the difference in nature and the composition of creation, as the soundness of the expression follows the soundness of the nature, and the gentleness of speech is proportional to the gentleness of creation" (Al-Jurjani, 2001). The ancient critics believe every meaning has a word that suits it (Wahhab, 1983). Rich linguistic words represent the meanings that suggest strength and intensity; the meanings that suggest tenderness and sweetness are represented by gentle and sweet words. Ibn al-Athir expressed this by saying: "Rich words are represented in the ear as people who have awe and dignity, and gentle words are represented as people who have gentleness, softness, morals, and a gentle temperament" (Al-Shaib, 1996). Based on what Ibn al-Athir said, the words differ according to the poetic purposes and meanings that the poet addresses, and according to the psychological reality of the poet. This fact appears clearly in the poetry of Suraqa, for when he is in the process of boasting about chivalry, he musters the vocabulary that is equal to it in strength and magnitude or that suggests severity and extreme might, such as war, death, combat, killing, and others.

It's only natural that the term war is constantly in his description, especially since he lived through conflicting military and political events. This phenomenon becomes more apparent to those who contemplate his verses, in which he says:

"فلما أتتنا شيعَةُ الله تدَّعي
مذارُ رحانا ساعةً ورحاهم
لها لهبٌ تبييضُ منه المقادِمُ
وطاحتُ أكفٌ بيننا وجماجمُ"

"When the Shiites of God came to us claiming, it has a flame that whitens the foreheads

I ground our millstones for an hour, and their millstones, Hands, and skulls fell between us (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

Suraqa conveyed the horror and intensity of the situation through his use of words and expressions that reflect this power, such as (foreheads, millstones, skulls). These are words of the law of the bell, providing the piece with the strength and solidity appropriate to the meanings of heroism the poet sought to express. The words richness and solidity are also evident in the elegy for the leader Ibn Mikhnaf, who rushed with all his might to confront the enemy, constantly prepared to engage in the fiercest battles, as he says:

"لم أرَ مثلَ الخيلِ خيلِ ابنِ مخنفٍ
كامل
أشدُّ ولا أمضى على الهولِ مقدِّما
المنازلِ
غداةً انتدى بالشاكريِّ ابن
واقتلَ للقرنِ المشيِّح

"I have never seen horses like the horses of Ibn Mikhnaf, On the morning he met with Al-Shakri Ibn Kamil

More powerful and decisive in their advance against terror, And kill for the horn the descending Messiah (Al-Barqi, 1947) "

The horn is the equal in courage and the Messiah: the one ahead of you. In addition to the eloquence and continuity, it is found that words that suggest the intensity of the tragedy and pain of the afflicted, such as (crying, death, repose, tears, eye, ... and others), as in his saying:

"أعينيَّ جوداً بالدموعِ السواكبِ وكوناً كواهي شنةً مع راكبٍ"

"My eyes are filled with tears, and we were like a camel with a rider (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

In addition to their strength and richness, the words in other texts are characterized by ease and clarity, due to our poet's distance from the Bedouin environment and his living in urban environments under the sway of Islam. Moving on to the introductions to his erotic poems, clearer and simpler words are found, tending toward delicacy and tenderness that befit the tenderness of the subject itself. Common words include: summer cloud, gazelle, sun, etc.

These delicate words become clear to us when we stop at his saying (Al-Barqi, 1947):

"بصُرْتُ بِهَا تَكَلِّمَ جَارِيَتَهَا فَلَا دَلَا عَتَبْتُ وَلَا قَوَامَا
رَأَيْتُ غَمَامَةً فِي مَسْتَكِفٍّ عَلَتْ فِي عَارِضٍ كَسِيفٍ جَهَامَا
يُضِيءُ دُجَى الظَّلَامِ بَرِيقٍ فِيهَا وَتُبْصِرُ حِينَ تَبْتَئِمُ ابْتِسَامَا"

*"I saw her talking to her maid, but she neither blamed me nor stood up
I saw a cloud in a clear sky, rising in a dark, gloomy cloud
Its gleam illuminates the darkness, and she sees when she smiles. "*

In addition to simple and clear words, it has encountered rare and unusual words, appropriate to the subject. The poet has carefully chosen these words, which are sometimes difficult to understand. Anyone reading his verses will find that the poet lived during the pre-Islamic era. He described his horse's speed and the length and size of its frame, saying:

"سَهْبُ الْجَرَاءِ إِذَا عَوِيَتْ عَنَانُهُ سَحَقٌ إِذَا هُضِمَ الرَّعِيلُ الْمُطْنَبُ"

"When I haul its reins, the horses' steppe is crushed when the long-drawn-out herd is crushed (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

If the horses are thin and their atrophy appears, then his horse appears from among them with its great structure and height. With all of these descriptions, the poet wanted to say that his horse is purebred and carries the qualities of good horses. The poet did not use many foreign words despite the mixing of the people of his time with the foreigners as a result of the Islamic conquests and the expansion of the Arab Islamic state, but there were four words in his collection of poems, which are:

(Kazar, Al-Tareq, patriarchs, Marazbis) (Al-Barqi, 1947). He says:

"ثوى سيد الأزددين أزد شنوءة وأزد عمان رهن رمس بكازر
وثوب داعي الموت بالموت بيننا ودارت رحى حرب بقعس البطارق
وصاد رجال عن رجال وأبرزت نواجذها يوم الطعان مرابي"

"The master of the Azds, Azd Shanu'a and Azd Oman, has been laid to rest in a grave in Kazir

The garment of the caller of death has brought death among us, and the millstone of war has turned in the hollows of the patriarchs

Men hunted men and showed up, and the Marazbis have shown their molars on the day of the stabbing (Al-Barqi, 1947) "

Quote

This is to include something from the Qur'an or the Hadith, to make his speech strong and reliable (Al-Qazwini, 1966). Suraqa's quotations from Qur'anic texts were either explicit or implicit. He would quote some words or parts of Qur'anic verses and include them in his poetry verbatim or with changes to fit the scale and rhyme, so that the quoted part would become part of the poetic text, as in his saying:

"حرر كليباً إن خير صنيعه يوم الحساب العت والتحرير"

"Free a clip, for the best deed on the Day of Judgment is oppression and liberation (Al-Barqi, 1947) "

Quoting from the Holy Verse: (But if he is from a people hostile to you, and he is a believer, then the freeing of a believing enslaved person is permissible), Holy Quran, Surah An-Nisa, Verse: 92.

Pointing out that the best deeds before God on the Day of Resurrection are the manumission and liberation of enslaved people, and when he boasts of the strength and courage of his people, he describes the enemy army as weak and defeated before them, saying:

"علمتم إن كيدكم ضعيف وولى الجمع فانهزم انهزما"

"You know your plot is weak, and the army has turned back and been completely defeated (Al-Barqi, 1947) "

Referring to the Holy Verse: (The multitude will be defeated and turn their backs).

The poet also used Islamic expressions such as: (Lord of the Easts, may God be gracious, may God bless you, may God reward you, Prophet of God). These words and expressions appeared alone in Sardaqa's poetry, and sometimes they were mentioned in conjunction. Prayer was combined with fasting, as in his saying:

وخولانُ التي لم تُعطِ إلا نبيَّ الله إذ صاماً

"And Khawlan was not given to anyone except the Prophet of God when he prayed and fasted (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

The expressions were also coupled with each other, such as (may God bless you) with (Lord of the Easts) in his saying:

فقلتُ تلقاكُ الإلهُ برحمةٍ وصلى عليك اللهُ ربُّ المشارقِ

"I said, "May God receive you with mercy, and may God, Lord of the Easts, bless you (Al-Barqi, 1947) "

He does not limit his quotations to the Holy Quran but refers to the Prophetic hadiths. His poems include sacred social relationships, including marriage, the pillars of which Islam has defined. The poet preaches, saying:

لا تطلبن فتاةً من وسامتها ما لَمْ يوافقك منها الدين والخلق

"Do not ask a girl for her beauty unless she agrees with you in terms of religion and morals (Al-Barqi, 1947) "

This view is represented by the noble Hadith by the Prophet Mohammed: "A woman is married for four reasons: her wealth, her lineage, her beauty, and her religion. So marry the one not religious, and may your hands be covered with dust" (Al-Kulayni, 2007).

Inclusion

Suraqa is considered one of the poets' who were influenced by the poetry of the pre-Islamic era and the poetry of his era. Suraqa included poems of those who came before him, and as a result he cancelled a poem as you say:

"ما زاد من وجدٍ على وجدٍ بها
عقر المطية إذ عرضن لعقرها
إلا ابن عمي يوم دارٍ جُلجلٍ
إن الكريم إذا يهيج يختلٍ
وتقول لما مال جانبُ خدرها
إنزل لك الوليات إنك مُرجلي"

"Nothing increased my longing for her except my cousin on the day of Darat Jaljul.

He hamstrung the mount when they presented themselves to hamstring it, indeed, when a noble person is agitated, he becomes disoriented.

And she says, when the side of her veil tilted, may you be afflicted with calamities, for you are my cauldron (Al-Kulayni, 2007)."

Referring to these verses of Imru' Al-Qais when he said:

"ألا ربَّ يومٍ لك منهنَّ صالح
ويومٍ عقرت للعداري مطيتي
ولا سيما يومٍ بدارةٍ جُلجلٍ
فيا عجباً من رَحْلِها المتحمل
فقال لك الوليات إنك مُرجلي"

"There are many a day when you have a good one from them, especially a day in Darat Juljul

And the day I barren my mount for the virgins, Oh, how amazing is her enduring journey

And the day she entered the chamber of Unayzah, the calamities said to you, you are my tormentor (Al-Qais, 2004)."

Among the poets of his time from whom he took and whose poetry he used in his poems was Jarir, who said, flirting with the whiteness of his beloved's teeth:

"تجري السواك على نقيٍّ لونه مثل المدامة ريحة أو أطيّب"

"The siwak runs on a pure color, like perseverance; it smells better (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

Including Jarir's saying:

"تجري السواك على أغرٍّ كأنه بردٌ تحدر من متون غمام"

"The siwak runs on the whiteness of the sky, as if it were hail falling from the backs of clouds (Al-Tamimi, 2013)."

Structures

It is one of the important elements in constructing a poetic text, as it is the vessel that contains all the elements of linguistic construction. The creative poet contemplates the speech elements, attempting to diversify the structures, avoiding violating grammatical rules, because grammar is "the foundation upon which meaning rests. When a certain degree of deviation from word order and correspondence rules is achieved, the sentence dissolves and the ability to be understood disappears" (Cohen, 1986). The poet was proficient in the vocabulary and syntactic structure of the poetic text. The methods of construction in the poet were represented in:

Affirmation style

The main purpose of using the confirmation method is to confirm the confirmed, and to remove doubt, forgetfulness, and error from it (Adeeb, 1984).

Other purposes branch out from this basic purpose, the most important of which are: (alert, remind, threaten, or draw attention to a specific emotion such as sadness, joy, etc.) (Ja'far, 2015). The poet used moral emphasis to show suffering, as in his saying:

"فلمثلُ قَتْلِكَ هَدَّ قومَكَ كُلَّهُمْ من كان يحملُ عنهمُ الأثقالا"

"For the sake of your killing, all your people were destroyed, who carried their burdens (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

The word "kul" (all) came to embody the comprehensiveness and encompassment of the calamity that befell all his people. One of the methods of emphasis is emphasis with verb-like letters, such as "inna" (the) and "anna" (that), as in the saying:

"هذا قضاءُ البارقيِّ وإنني بالميلِ في ميزانهم لبصيرُ"

"This is the judgment of Al-Barqi, and I am aware of the inclination in their scales (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

Notably, the poet frequently uses two or more affirmations in a single verse or more in his collection of poems to further confirm the meanings he wants to convey, which is why the poet uses this style more often.

Conditional style

The conditional style had a large share in the poet's collection. The non-assertive conditional tool prevailed over the assertive conditional tool. Among the assertive ones is his saying:

"ذهب السوابقُ غُدوةً وتركه إني كذلك مَنْ أناضلُ ينضلُ"

"The precedents went in the morning and left him, I am also he who struggled, struggles (Al-Barqi, 1947)"

The poet found in the conditional name "man" a way to boast about the strength of his poetry and the meagerness and weakness of others' poetry. As for the conditional name "in," it emphasized the attributes, as in his saying:

"إِنْ يَقتلوكَ أبا حَكيمٍ غدرَةً فلقد تشدُّ فتقتلُ الأبطالاً إِنْ يُثكلونا سيداً لمسَوِّدٍ ضخم الوسيعة ماجداً مفضالاً"

"If they kill you, Abu Hakim, treacherously, it may tighten so that heroes are killed

If they bereave us master of the master, huge in size, noble and generous (Al-Barqi, 1947) "

As for the non-assertive conditional tool (if), it came from the wisdom in his saying:

"ودع الفواحش ما استطعت لأهلها وإذا هممت بأمرٍ صدقٍ فأفعل"

"And leave the indecencies as much as you can for their people, and if you intend to do something honest, then do it (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

As for the conditional tool (لو law), which is a particle of impossibility for impossibility, the poet used it in his poetry, and it added to his poetic style a solidity and richness in his pride:

"ولو أصبحت في حَكَمٍ مقيماً وخفَّ الزحفُ لم أَرهْبُ أثاماً"

"Even if I became a resident arbitrator, the march has slowed down, I fear no sins (Al-Barqi, 1947) "

A- Advancement and delay

Abdul Qahir al-Jurjani said: "It is a subject full of many benefits, abundant in beauty, broad in scope, and far-reaching. It never ceases to reveal to you its marvels and leads you to its subtleties. You will never cease to see poetry that pleases you to listen to and that is pleasing to you when something is presented in it and the wording is transferred from one place to another" (Al-Jurjani, 1973). This art found a place in Suraqa's poetry, including the introduction of the prepositional phrase before the direct object, as in his saying:

"لقينا منهم ضربًا طَلَخًا وطعنًا صائبًا حتى انثينا"

"We were severely beaten and stabbed from them until we fell back (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

The prepositional phrase (them) is missing from the direct object (beaten), perhaps for scale. The subject may also precede the verb, as in:

"والرفقُ يجمعُ اهل البيتِ ما اجتمعوا وقد يشقُّ على أصحابهِ الخُرْقُ"

"Kindness gathers people together as long as they are together, even if it is difficult for their people to be ripped off (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

The subject (kindness) is placed before the verb (gathers). Similarly, the predicate is placed before the subject, as in:

"قَرْدُ الخصيلِ وفي العظامِ بقيةً من صنعةٍ قَدَّمْتُها لا تذهبُ"

"The monkey of the hair, and in the bones, there is a remnant of the craftsmanship I have presented that will not go away (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

He placed the prepositional phrase (the predicate) (in the bones) before the subject (remnant). It is noteworthy that the poet used two prepositional phrases in more than one place in the same verse, as in his description of the planting:

"وَجَرَتْ لَهُ طَيْرُ الْإِيَامِنِ غُدْوَةً وَلَهُنَّ طَيْرٌ بِالْأَشَانِمِ تَنْعَبُ"

"And the birds of good fortune flew to him in the morning, and they have birds of bad fortune that cawing (Al-Barqi, 1947)."

He put the prepositional phrase (his bird) before the subject (bird), and in the second half, the subject (bird) before the verb (springs), so our poet used them to put them first in one verse to exaggerate his pride in his chivalry.

Conclusions

This study has revealed many insights and findings about Suraqa's life, poetry, and artistic performance. The following conclusions can be revealed:

1. Suraqa was of Azdi origin, chaste, wise, a brave, witty, and proud knight, devoted to the Azd tribe, one of the Qahtani tribes renowned for their poetry and chivalry.
2. This positioning earned him a distinguished status, making some of his poetry resonate with ancient and modern poets.
3. His poetry is scattered throughout books on various subjects.
4. In the technical study of Suraqa's poetry, the number of stanzas exceeds the number of poems in the collection, as evidenced by the table provided. However, the number of verses in the poems outnumbers the verses in the stanzas and fragments.
5. The external structure of the poem is structured in two patterns.
 - A complete poem that does not deviate from the style of the pre-Islamic poem, with multiple purposes. His skill in composing the complete poem is evidence of the endurance that distinguished the poet.
 - A poem with a single poetic theme, and short compared to a full poem, in which he departed from the traditional framework of Arabic poetry to embrace a sense of novelty and innovation.
6. As for his vocabulary, it was consistent with the poet's purpose and psychological reality. It also demonstrated richness, strength, clarity, ease, and a lack of artificiality. Furthermore, the dominance of words of pride and war in his collection, and his reliance on the language of the Holy Qur'an, he employed many of its vocabulary and images, providing an inexhaustible source from which he also derived his poetic imagery and employed it in the service of the text. The heritage of proverbs, wisdom, and Arabic poetry also provided another source of inspiration in his collection's poetry.

7. As for his structures, the research concluded that they are characterized by simplicity and clarity, while some stylistic phenomena appear in his poetry, most notably the frequent use of emphasis, separation between related words, and the advancement and postponement of the word. He also uniquely uses the introductory letter "hatta حتى" (meaning even) in several places in the collection.
